

Persecution of Environmental Defenders in the US and Russia

From the Report by Crude Accountability and Ecoforum of NGOs of Kazakhstan

Kate Watters, Executive Director, Crude Accountability

September 11, 2017

Standing Rock: Activists as “terrorists”

Activists working to stop mountain top removal, Julia Bonds (top right) and Maria Gunnoe (bottom right), harassed and threatened by corporate and government representatives in West Virginia.

Moriah Stephenson (left) and Stefan Warner, charged with “Terrorism Hoax” by the Oklahoma police for hanging a banner in the atrium of the Devon Energy Center in Oklahoma City, as they protested the Keystone XL pipeline.

A bold act of ecoterrorism? Courtesy Great Plains Tar Sands Resistance

Helen Slottje, fighting to stop fracking in the state of New York, was threatened physically and through the legal system by corporate and government representatives.

Russian environmental defenders are routinely physically harassed, attacked, and harmed. Murder is not uncommon.

Igor Golubenkov, of Saving Taman!, after he was beaten at the entrance to his home by thugs yelling, “Stop your environmental work!”

Mikhail Kreindlin of Greenpeace, beaten by unidentified attackers in Krasnodar Krai during a volunteer fire brigade training. The attackers entered private property in the middle of the night, beating activists and destroying property. (Photo courtesy of the BBC.)

Destruction of Property During Unwarranted Office Search:
Environmental Watch on the North Caucasus, Krasnodar Krai, Russia, April 2017

Read the full report here:

<http://crudeaccountability.org/dangerous-work-report/>

Ecoforum of NGOs of Kazakhstan
And

CRUDE ACCOUNTABILITY